

WINTERY KNIGHT

...integrating Christian faith and knowledge in the public square

« NEWER OLDER »

06/18/2012 • 10:00 AM

Are gay relationships typically stable and monogamous?

ECM sent me this post (<http://www.thepublicdiscourse.com/2012/06/5640>) from The Public Discourse which explains a bit more about the two studies on gay parenting that were in the news last week. Some people are complaining that the study did not use enough long-term gay relationships. This quote explains why that was not feasible.

Excerpt:

The [NFSS] study found that the children who were raised by a gay or lesbian parent as little as 15 years ago were usually conceived within a heterosexual marriage, which then underwent divorce or separation, leaving the child with a single parent. That parent then had at least one same-sex romantic relationship, sometimes outside of the child's home, sometimes within it. To be more specific, among the respondents who said their mother had a same-sex romantic relationship, a minority, 23%, said they had spent at least three years living in the same household with both their mother and her romantic partner. Only 2 out of the 15,000 screened spent a span of 18 years with the same two mothers. Among those who said their father had had a same-sex relationship, 1.1% of children reported spending at least three years together with both men.

This strongly suggests that the parents' same-sex relationships were often short-lived, a finding consistent with the broader research on elevated levels of instability among same-sex romantic partners. For example, a recent 2012 study of same-sex couples in Great Britain finds that gay and lesbian cohabiting couples are more likely to separate than heterosexual couples.^[3]

(http://www.thepublicdiscourse.com/2012/06/5640#_edn3) A 2006 study of same sex marriages in Norway and Sweden found that "divorce risk levels are considerably higher in same-sex marriages"^[4] (http://www.thepublicdiscourse.com/2012/06/5640#_edn4) such that Swedish lesbian couples are more than three times as likely to divorce as heterosexual couples, and Swedish gay couples are 1.35 times more likely to divorce (net of controls). Timothy Biblarz and Judith Stacey, two of the most outspoken advocates for same-sex marriage in the U.S. academy, acknowledge that there is more instability among lesbian parents.^{[51] (http://www.thepublicdiscourse.com/2012/06/5640#_edn5)}

Therefore, while critics of the NFSS have faulted it for lacking comparisons between children of IBFs and the children of committed and intact gay or lesbian couples, this was attempted, but was not feasible. Despite drawing from a large, representative sample of the U.S. population, and despite using screening tactics designed to boost the number of respondents who reported having had a parent in a same-sex relationship, a very small segment reported having been parented by the same two women or two men for a minimum of three years. Although there is much speculation that today there are large numbers of same-sex couples in the U.S. who are providing a stable, long-term parenting relationship for their children, no studies based upon large, random samples of the U.S. population have been published that show this to be true, and the above-cited studies of different nations show that on average, same-sex couple relationships are more short-lived than those of opposite-sex couples.

Despite the lack of empirical evidence for the claim that today there are large numbers of stable, two-parent gay households, for the last ten years, contemporary gay parenting research has nevertheless claimed that there are “no significant differences” (and some benefits) to being raised by same-sex parents. Therefore, Regnerus analyzed the new NFSS data to verify this claim. In the end, he found the claim to be more plausible when comparing the grown children of parents who had a same-sex relationship to the grown children of divorced, adopted, single-parented, or step-parented arrangements. The claim is false if one compares the grown children of a parent who had a same-sex relationship to those from IBFs. While the study has been criticized for “comparing apples to oranges,” Regnerus’s work studies the reality of the population of children who were raised by parents who had same-sex relationships.

I think this is an important point to make – and it’s consistent with the research from previous studies (<http://www.frc.org/get.cfm?i=IS04C02>). People have been getting their opinions about what the gay lifestyle is really like for children from biased sources and popular culture. But we need to look at research to really know what is true. Any leftist Hollywood producer with money can make a TV show in which all the religious/conservative people look like devils, and all the gay couples are faithful, committed, monogamous and non-violent. But that’s not research – that’s television. To really make policies that protect children, we have to look at the facts.

The right way to think about gay marriage is to think about it as an extension of no-fault divorce. The same feminists and leftists who pushed for the legalization of no-fault divorce told us back then that the children would be fine, that children are resilient. No-fault divorce was a change in the definition of marriage. The leftists said that divorce would never become widespread, and that it would not harm children in any way. It was all a pack of lies. If the practices of the gay lifestyle become conflated with marriage, then marriage will come to denote relationships engaged in for “love” not children, such that unchastity, infidelity, increased domestic violence and frequent break-ups are incorporated back into the definition of marriage.

Filed under: News, Adoption, AIDS, American Psychological Association, APA, Bi-Sexual, Child, Children, Children's Rights, Civil Society, Court, Donor-Conceived Children, Egg Donor, Family, Father, Female, Gay, Gay Marriage, Gay Parenting, GLBT, Health, Lesbian, LGBT, Male, Marriage, Men, Mother, Natural Marriage, Parenting, Prop 8, Proposition 8, Research, Same-Sex Marriage, Study, Traditional Marriage, Women

3 Responses

Homosexuality and Academic Research | Real Clear Apologetics says:

06/22/2012 at 11:59 AM

[...] Wintery Knight as provided me with some new information as to why Regnerus struggled to find stable same-sex couples. [...]

REPLY

Homosexuality and Academic Research | RCA Blogs says:

10/12/2012 at 4:13 PM

[...] Wintery Knight as provided me with some new information as to why Regnerus struggled to find stable same-sex couples. Share the [...]

REPLY

Social Apologetics | Homosexuality and Academic Research says:

02/10/2015 at 4:08 PM

[...] Wintery Knight has provided me with some new information as to why Regnerus struggled to find stable same-sex couples. In a [...]

REPLY

Blog at WordPress.com.

The Grid Focus Theme.

◎ Follow

Follow “Wintery Knight”

Build a website with WordPress.com